If yes, in what ways do think this was explored?

It was great because it showed the girl working things out and making everything happen on her own, meaning that she makes a good journey

Told a story through pictures alone, which is quite clever you can see the girl going through all different kinds of experiences and jobs like a normal day. weird twists in what is otherwise normal the girl wakes up somewhere and tries to find her way back to normality

Through the main character and her actions.

the girl gets on with her business in her house the journey of the protagonist getting ready was obvious as it had a clear start and finish

The scariness is shown because the girl is alone and mysterious things happen around her such as the door closing by itself

Clear conventions that are associated with the typical routine of getting up

The girl is sorting herself out and exploring the house.

The camera followed the girl around everywhere and saw what she was doing.

I think that the girl is in love with her house and makes love to it by walking through it through the girl's journey

Lots of different actions and effects by following the main character by showing the lonely girl walking around her house with nobody to talk to

If no, how could the narrative be clearer?

more characters for her to speak to

It's good that the narrative isn't clear because it means that there are more cool effects

Have more dialogue and maybe another character by having more characters by not having her jump around in the photos wasn't sure what was going on, have her do more.

have more of a proper introduction maybe make the girl speak more not sure

More talking and characters.

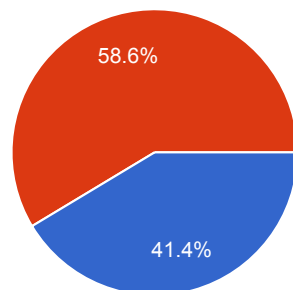

it's a bit clear because the girl is sad but i don't really know why happened too quickly for me to realise what was going on less cheesy, too put on
